Students With Specific Learning Disabilities Can Pass State Competency Exams: Systematic Strategy Instruction Makes a Difference

LESLIE M. BERRY AND WELSH J. ARNOLD IV

ABSTRACT: Students with specific learning disabilities (SLD) are required to pass the same competency exams as students classified as general education in order to graduate to any grade level and to enter a high school program. In this study, 50 students with SLD and 50 general education students used the established state writing rubric to measure student performance. The authors found that the direct strategy for students with SLD who received strategy instruction and practice was equal to the average achieved by the general education population of the state in the same year and was no significantly different than the general education peers in the same school for the year.

Key Words: accommodations, competency exams, specific learning disabilities (SLD)

Results indicate that the use of the No Child Left Behind (NCLB) Act includes mandates for national education reform designed to improve accountability for the student achievement (Lewis, 2003). The mandate of the NCLB Act includes requiring states to demonstrate student performance through standardized competency exams (Linn, Baker, & Brookhart, 2002; McDaniel, 2002). In response to this legislation, state departments of education across the country have begun to implement competency exams to assess student performance as they progress through grade levels and/or graduate from secondary, middle, and high school programs (Chadwick, Kicker, Ogden, & Swanson, 2002).

One of the most important aspects of the NCLB Act is the mandate for administering competency exams to students with specific learning disabilities (SLD; Lewis, 2003). Students are concerned that students with SLD may not be significantly prepared for competency exams in comparison with their general education peers because they have not received the same instruction (Baker & Zigmond, 1999) or may not receive the same curriculum (Baker, 1999; Ray, McLaughlin, & Wagner Thomas, 2003). Students with SLD may also perceive accommodations, test prep courses, and test-prep practice as a good end program for special services or alternative classroom assignments (Baker, 1999; Ray et al., 2002).
